Sibs, schools or sorting: What drives educational inequality in East Africa?

Sam Jones, Associate Professor of Economics University of Copenhagen

Sam Jones will present his research that identifies the unique contributions of siblings, schools and sorting effects to variation in learning outcomes. His study applies a novel technique to UWEZO test score data, covering over one million children across East Africa.

Sam Jones is a development economist with interests in applied economic and policy analysis, focussing on sub-Saharan Africa in particular. He works extensively with macro- and micro-economic data from developing countries.
