Education, Poverty and International Development

Series Editor: Madeleine Arnot, University of Cambridge, UK

<https://www.routledge.com/Education-Poverty-and-International-Development/book-series/EPID>

The series brings together researchers from the fields of anthropology, economics, development studies, educational studies, politics international relations and sociology. It represents a unique opportunity to publish work by some of the most distinguished writers in the fields of education and development along with that of new authors working on important empirical projects. The series contributes important insights on the linkages between education and society based on inter-disciplinary, international and national studies.

The contributors to this series offer sharp, critical and innovative studies that are likely to have a strategic influence upon the thinking of academics and policy-makers. They include critical syntheses of existing research and policy, innovative research methodologies, and in-depth evaluations of major policy developments. Some studies address topics relevant to poverty alleviation, national and international policy-making and aid, whilst others represent anthropological or sociological investigations on how education works or does not work within local communities, for households living in poverty or for particular socially marginalised groups. These studies offer a comparative international approach, raising interesting theoretical and policy issues with clear relevance for international audiences.

“This beautifully written and well edited book is a fitting acknowledgement of Chris Colclough’s immense contribution to the global agenda and action on education for all. It brings together masterful analytical and practical insights into how social and economic inequalities impact on outcomes of schooling, and how education reforms should respond to achieve more equitable outcomes. An important read for anyone who seeks to understand and address educational inequalities in global south contexts”.
